metal. Mud Springs boomed and the town decided it needed a more attractive name. And what name could be better than El Dorado? By the 1880s, most of the gold had gone, but the spirit of that rush has remained throughout the Golden State.	10
[C] Although California's sunny climate is a big attraction for many, the state's strong economy is what really appeals to millions of people. Silicon Valley in Northern California, for example, is home to many of the world's largest technology companies: Apple, Meta (formerly known as Facebook), Google, eBay, Netflix and many others.	15
[D] Each of these began as a small start-up company – often just one or two people and a good idea. For example, the first Apple computers were made in a bedroom, and Google began as a student project. In the 1990s, internet start-ups became a kind of 'California Gold Rush 2.0', and millions of dollars were spent on starting new web businesses. People thought this would go on forever, but in 2001 the 'dot-com bubble' burst, and millions of dollars were lost. A new boom, however, has made technology one of the leading industries in California and worldwide.	20
[E] Agriculture has long been another Californian success story. The state's climate is ideal for growing fruit and vegetables, and great fortunes have been made from this. However, the good times may not last forever. Growing fruit and vegetables needs a lot of water, and water shortages are one of California's biggest problems. The drought which started 2011 has caused particularly serious problems for farmers, who now have to use new cultivation techniques to save water.	25
[F] The success of California's industries also attracts workers from other parts of the US and from Latin America – especially Mexico – who often do jobs such as picking fruit, cleaning homes, working in restaurants, etc. Many of the Hispanic workers cross the border illegally and there are Californians who think the US-Mexican borders should be guarded more effectively. In their opinion, it's just one small step from illegal immigration to more serious crimes. Other Californians, however, say that without these illegal immigrants, who often do the hard jobs no Americans want to do, many farms and businesses would have to close down.	30
